

I strongly oppose allowing cell phone use aboard commercial airline flights. I have had enough experience listening to other people's cell phone conversations on buses and trains, in grocery lines, and in all sorts of other public places to know that I don't want them to be part of air travel. Airplanes are uncomfortable enough without having to endure the inane prattle that constitutes most cell phone usage. Whatever they have to say can wait until they're on the ground, and that should be the law.